After a verb in the past tense, a present conditional in English, expressing a single action, in the future past, is a past conditional in Italian. He said he would go, disse che sarebbe andato, an expression which might also mean He said he would have gone. Similarly, He said we should have it rough before long, disse che ne avremmo avuto fra breve tempo. But if the action has already begun the present conditional is used in Italian as in English. He said we should have it rough until daybreak, disse che ne avremmo sino all' alba.

The present conditional is however sometimes used in sequence to a past verb where the rule indicated above fails, and I have been unable to discover any trustworthy clue to the difficulty; it is not discussed in any grammar that I have seen.

2. The conditional may sometimes be avoided; He was afraid he — have to go, temeva di dover andare. He thought he — try, ha voluto tentare. I thought I — speak to you about it, ho creduto bene di parlarvene.
